Dear Eric,

Since I have known you since 1995 and can say that I have only observed appropriate behavior of how you comport yourself around all persons. You are very "fair minded" and equal opportunity person. You often propose alternative ideas that are meant to challenge my thinking. You not bashful when you talk about sexual issues, which is a healthy attitude. In reading your writings on your website all these years, I have never found anything inappropriate. Like Dwight Eisenhower is famous for saying, everyone should be their own editor and get to decide what is offensive or inappropriate for their senses.

I am sorry that you have had to carry your cross "because of your opinions" regarding your chosen sexuality and defender of all persons. I have always said, "We are all single in our desires." and know what we want to experience in our exploration. Having operated a Heterosexual Masturbation Club for over 30 years, I can tell you that both men and women have a lot of sexual healing that needs to be accomplished. One of the first steps, is finding out that we all have similar past, we have all struggled with unwanted advances, we have all struggled with guilt and the right to enjoy our sexual explorations. We teach everyone that we all have our own "sexual histories" and from that we find out how brave we are in getting it right in our heads. When we claim the totality of our own history and march forward with a desire to learn how to please ourselves and others, is when real growth begins. Thank you Eric, for your questioning the right for young men/men to be okay with challenging unwanted advances, trickery from others who take advantage of ones innocent. I guess the bus was painted PINK and they didn't want you to get on it. Consider this experience as part of your sexual history. Lesson learned!

Affectionately,

Lynda Gayle Roberts
